Planning Commissions and governing bodies are tasked with crafting public policies that determine how people use and develop their land. In facing all of the complexities of meeting state and federal law and addressing social, environmental and economic concerns, too often we don’t take the time to involve the people who will be affected by the decisions.

Engaging your fellow townspeople not only helps generate ideas and solutions customized for the community, it reduces the possibility that a planning initiative will be opposed by voters. Citizen participation takes time, energy and focus, but without it, planning has little value. An inclusive process that creates buy-in brings any planning product to life.

Communicate * Communicate * Communicate

Community involvement starts with informed citizens. Make it a priority to communicate your planning activities. Choose a format like a short monthly update using one or more media – websites, Front Porch Forum, local newspapers, etc. and let people know what the planning commission is working on, what issues are under discussion, anticipated next steps and invite participation.

- Keep language simple. Always use language and explanations that everyone, not just those in the know, can understand. Most people find planning and zoning jargon to be unintelligible so explain issues as simply as possible, in plain English, focusing on why it matters.

- Get the word out in multiple ways. People need to know about public policies that might affect them but busy lives leave little “band width” to learn about and absorb the implications of land use policies. For this reason, it is important to communicate often, and in multiple ways, so that the message reaches as many people as possible.

Routine Meetings

- At a minimum, make sure meeting agendas and approved meeting minutes are posted online in a place where the public can easily find them.

- Welcome citizens who attend meetings and give a little orientation so they know how to participate. For example, bring a copy of the Essentials of Land Use Planning and Regulations to meetings and show visitors the sections pertinent to your meeting.
Special Projects

When embarking on a municipal plan, a bylaw update or other planning activity, especially if it involves potentially controversial issues, citizen participation needs to be front and center.

- Plan to plan – start your project with a citizen participation strategy and integrate it into your project.
- Take time to talk informally, one-on-one, with individuals who are likely to have the most concerns. The simple acts of listening and showing respect can help alleviate the anxiety people experience when they think a planning action might threaten their property, livelihood or way of life.
- Learn about skills and methods for engaging the public productively in decision-making.
  - UVM Extension offers fact sheets, and other resources on citizen participation and meeting processes.
  - The Community Planning website from the UK offers a soup-to-nuts compendium of tools for public outreach.

Equity & Inclusion

Recent events and writings have brought a critical focus on past and present planning decisions and their role in socioeconomic segregation, racial discrimination, affordable housing exclusion, environmental injustice, and disparate impacts.

Projects that involve those impacted by planning decisions are more likely to support equity and opportunity. Design your project and decision-making process to include the voices of diverse and under-represented people in your community, such as renters, youth, and busy parents. Share your power to create a shared future and a shared prosperity.

Applications and projects that include equity-oriented and inclusive public participation methods will be given priority. Design your project to engage the participation of the broader public, especially commonly under-served and under-represented populations in your community.

For more information, please contact: Jennifer Lavoie, Grant Specialist
802-828-1948